"Mrs. Clark said she thought that with these things they should go to the whole root of the matter. Why was it that people wanted to play these games on Sundays? They said it was because they had not the time in the week days. She thought it was Gladstone who said that if every man and woman did their right proportion of work there would be only four and a half hours' work per day for each. Women would flock into the shops to buy at half-past five or a quarter to six in the afternoon, which hindered the assistants from clearing up. If women would try to avoid late shopping it would be a great help. She thought eight hours was long enough for anyone to work. Doctors had said that the proper division of the day was eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, and eight hours for play or leisure."
