The first half of October was unusually wet in Perth and all South-West districts, but after the 14th the weather clear during the remainder of the month only a few occasional showers fell. The mean pressure at Perth was unusually low—in fact, it h lower on only two previous occasions, one of these being October, 1898. The mean maximum day temperature was about the sam previous years, but the nights were remarkably mild; the mean minimum at the Botanic Gardens being the highest during the last years. There was an average difference of nearly seven degrees in the night temperatures of Perth Gardens and York.

The climate map shows that the summer is making itself felt in the Kimberley district, where the mean maximum day temp was the highest. Temperatures of over 100 degrees in the shade have been experienced several times in the tropics, the highest beir degrees at Onslow; but the century has not yet been reached farther South than Onslow. Between 90 degrees and 100 degrees h recorded down as far as Geraldton, and thence through the Murchison and Coolgardie Goldfields, and also at Eyre on one day.

The rainfall was very light in the Kimberley district, and none at all fell throughout the North-West country; but, from Sha Southwards, it was everywhere in excess of the average for previous years. The South-West districts received most of their rain first half of the month, and the Goldfields received theirs as an accompaniment to a succession of very heavy thunderstorms during week of the month.

The total rainfall at Perth, from 1st January to 31st October, has been 3,126 points, or 16 points below the average for the 1 23 years.
