This month was characterised in Perth by mild pleasant weather. The mean temperatures, both maximum and minimum, were very nearly the same as for the corresponding month last year, but were considerably below the general average for previous years. The highest temperature recorded during the month at the Perth Gardens was 86.4, and on only one occasion during the last 23 years has it been as low as that. The highest ever recorded in November was 105°.

Taking the Colony generally, we find that the usual summer conditions of atmospheric pressure have set in, the barometers being highest on the South-West and South coast, with falling gradients thence Northwards. The mean temperature has advanced nearly 10° throughout the Tropics. The heat has been most intense at Hall's Creek, in the Kimberley district, where the mean monthly maximum was 105.4°, and the temperature has exceeded 100° some time during the month at all stations from Coolgardie Northwards, with the exception of Geraldton and Carnarvon. The highest reading was 112.8° at Condon on the 12th.

In Southern Districts, the increase of temperature as compared with last month has been only about 2° on an average, except well inland where it has been greater. The effect of the sea breeze in modifying the heat during the daytime is very marked. Thus the mean daily maximum at

Fremantle	"	70.0°
Perth Observatory	"	72.5°
Perth Gardens	"	76.2°
York	"	80.2°
Southern Cross	"	85.1°

The coolest place in the Colony is Breaksea Island, where the mean daily maximum temperature is only 64.4°. The region of coldest nights is the neighbourhood of Katanning, where the mean minimum was 48.6°, and the absolute lowest temperature for the month 37.0°.

The rainfall from the latitude of Perth Southwards was, on the whole, slightly in excess of the average for previous years, but to the North it was poor, and throughout the North-West country no rain at all was recorded.

The total fall at the Perth Gardens from January 1st to November 30th has been 31.84 inches, or about half an inch less than the average amount.
