NOTES ON THE CLIMATE FOR FEBRUARY, 1906.

This month, judged by the maximum daily temperatures, was the coolest February ever experienced in Perth since records started, in 1876. The mean maximum at the Observatory was 80.5, and the temperature did not once reach 90°, a circumstance which has never been known to occur before.

This exceptionally cool weather extended along the West Coastal districts from about Carnarvon (lat. 24.42) to Bunbury; but thence again Southward it commenced to assume more normal proportions, until, at Cape Leeuwin, the mean was slightly in excess of that for previous years.

It will, therefore, be seen that the welcome coolness extended only over a very small portion of the State. In all other portions the heat was excessive. At Kalgoorlie the mean maximum was 94.8, being 14° above that for the Perth Observatory, and the highest, with one exception, that has yet been registered in February.

When the means of the daily maximum temperatures are plotted on a map, it is seen that the 90° line includes the entire State, with the exception of a narrow strip of coastline between the N.W. Cape and Eucla; and the 100° line includes more than half the State, the highest mean being 109.1°, at Nullagine. The absolute maximum was 116°, at Marble Bar. The general feature of the daily weather maps throughout the month was the passage of a succession of moderate "lows" across from the N.W. coast through the interior towards South Australia, each one causing great heat and scattered thunderstorms. In fact, if the climate of Australia, as a whole, were studied, last month would probably be characterised as an exceptionally hot one throughout, for the heat waves, after traversing our interior districts, always travelled to the Eastern States, where they were severely felt. We have not yet, unfortunately, received the usual monthly statistics for Melbourne, but the mean max. at Adelaide was 92°, being 5.8° in excess of the average at that place for previous years, and 11.5° in excess of the mean at the Perth Observatory.

It may, perhaps, at first sight, appear remarkable that the weather should be so unusually cool on the West coast and so abnormally hot on the Coolgardie fields and throughout such a large portion of Australia. As a matter of fact, however, the two are probably diverse effects of the same cause. Great heat is generally associated with the passage of a "low," and during last February the main track of these "lows" lay well to the North or East of Perth. We were, therefore, on the cool side of them, as the wind tends always to move towards their centres, and this means a cool breeze from the ocean all along the West coast, whereas the inland places receive the full benefit of the passage of the hot centre at close quarters.

If, however, the storm track had been a little farther West, and the "lows" had come down the Indian Ocean just outside the West coast instead of well inside, our winds would come in towards the centre from the East and North-East, and we in Perth would experience a heat wave. Moreover, the effect on the Goldfields would not be nearly so marked. There would, in fact, then be a tendency to a more uniformly hot temperature throughout, and we should suffer whilst the Goldfields were benefited. This type of weather is now (March 7) being well exemplified. A "low" is evidently passing down the Indian Ocean in a South-Easterly direction towards our S.W. coast. Perth has therefore been experiencing a severe heat wave, with record temperature for March, whilst the Goldfields have been enjoying comparatively mild weather throughout the same period.

Frequent thunderstorms occurred on the Goldfields during the middle of the month, rain being moderate to heavy between the 14th and 21st, and on the latter date it became fairly general throughout the Southern portion of the State, after which a well-marked "high" came along, and brought more settled conditions. On the whole, the fall for the month was considerably in excess of the average for previous years throughout the Coolgardie fields and extreme South coastal districts. Elsewhere it was lighter than usual. No severe storms have been experienced yet this season in the tropics, and the rainfall has been, on the whole, considerably below the average for previous years.
