NOTES ON THE CLIMATE FOR THE MONTH OF JANUARY, 1907.

This month was, on the whole, hotter than usual in West coastal districts, but unusually cool on the Goldfields. It is, in fact, probable that the temperature was below normal throughout the greater part of Australia, because both Adelaide and Melbourne report readings considerably below the means for previous years. Notwithstanding the severity of the present summer on and near the West coast, there have been no prolonged heat waves. The weather has been dominated by a series of "highs" passing from West to East along the South coast, combined with a succession of small "lows," which have come down from the tropics. These have either passed across from the N.W. coast to the Bight, giving great heat in the interior, or have kept out in the Indian Ocean and travelled down the coast and round the Leeuwin, and thence Eastward.

CLIMATE—continued.

In the latter case they have been preceded by considerable heat in Western districts, and followed by a gradual cooling and a day or two of fresh, rather pleasant weather. Geraldton seems to have experienced the greatest abnormal effect from the heating process, as the mean maximum for the month was 7°.9 above the average for previous years. In fact, this January has been by far the hottest on record for Geraldton. The effect of the sea in modifying temperature can, as usual, be well seen from the returns of the mean daily maximum. Thus for Rottnest it is 78°.9, Fremantle 83°.3, Perth Observatory 85°.0, Perth Gardens 87°.3, Guildford 89°.1, and Northam 91°.4. Proceeding further East we come under the influence of the abnormal coolness which characterised the greater part of Australia, and at Coolgardie the mean maximum is 87°.6, or practically the same as for the Perth Gardens.

The nights were considerably cooler on the fields than near the coast. Thus the mean minimum at Coolgardie was 59°.1, whereas at the Observatory it was 64°.8, and at Fremantle, 65°.3.

On the South coast cool weather prevailed, as usual. At Cape Leeuwin the mean maximum was only 75°.0, at Albany 73°.8, and at Breaksea 69°.0, whilst the highest reading for the month was only 83°.0 at Cape Leeuwin, and 77°.0 at Breaksea.

Pressure was about normal throughout the South-West district, above the average for previous years on the goldfields, and below in the Tropics.

The rainfall was heavier than usual in the Kimberley district, and at Wallal it was the heaviest on record (13·64 inches). South of the Tropics it was, as usual, light, and on the whole about normal.
